Courage to Encourage

Encouragement is paramount to health and it goes two ways, we need to receive it and we need to give it. That means we need to practice it until we offer it authentically. Like many things, encouragement is easy to see and hard to do. In the church, we ought to be able to encourage others not because we feel obligated, but because we believe it is truly needed and we are willing to speak those words aloud.

Encouraging is also about saying its okay to fail. When we've fallen, it takes courage to get back up on that pony and try again. A word of encouragement can be just the salve to cover a wound and give us the will to try again. But don't misunderstand me, this trait, once honed, will lead to encouraging those outside the church. It may even become part of who we are; we could become known as people who lift others up wherever they are. Oddly enough, I believe that is exactly what Jesus meant when he said we are to be light and salt in the world. We aren't judges, we are lifter uppers. We were once lost in sin, but Jesus took us in.

We've been inspired to greater heights because God has lifted us up.

"Instead, in order that none of you be deceived by sin and become stubborn, you must help one another every day, as long as the word "Today" in the scripture applies to us." (Hebrews 3:13, TEV) Mike
